

THE WHITE HOUSE

WASHINGTON

December 14th, 2018

FOR IMMEDIATE RELEASE

Following a wide range of discussions since the creation of the Presidential Advisory Commission on Inactivity & Development on December 9th - the President wishes to announce what's in the works for the future.

Firstly, the President intends to work with congress people of both chambers and both parties to form a solution to the stagnation currently in our Office of Management & Budget. By appropriately restructuring the department to give developers the motivation they need and allow it to perform necessary functions for the upkeep of our nation's assets.

Secondly, the President wishes to announce the Manhattan Project although not nuclear, this project is aimed at taking the United States to a new level and bypass the issues faced by our usage of Washington, D.C. Lead primarily by MathMinded, an esteemed member of our community who appeared on a high-tier reality TV show is working in cohesion with the government to create a new, engaging experience molded into Lower Manhattan for users to experience.

Although it is too early to commit to any timescale, it is not probable that this project will be completed before the new term, however with both mainstream Presidential candidates signing on to the commission we are confident that the project is safe.

The Office of Management & Budget, meanwhile, will focus on taking into account the short-term needs of Washington D.C. in order to help stimulate a recovery of our capital city.
