

THE WHITE HOUSE

WASHINGTON

December 14th, 2018

My fellow Americans,

One month ago today I signed and sent the Treaty of London to the United States Senate for ratification. We limited this treaty so that it would expire 30 days later - to allow for us to use this period as an experimentation period.

I am happy to say that we are pleased with the progress that has been made over the past month. In the last week, the Secretary of State, Vice President and I have been consulting with members of our community; from all sections and functions with regard to the future of our foreign relations. What we've seen is a great consensus for moving forward. 14 months after departing the United Nations: we are finally ready to move on. Having worked with the leaders of the community for a while now, we have decided that this community is the appropriate one to move forward as a part of, and I'd like to explain why.

This community's activity is on par with our former. The nation states here are engaging, active and willing to participate in actual discussions and roleplay instead of bickering like children constantly as we've seen in the past. This community lusts for a leader and a member state like the United States. We've spoken to nearly all the nation state leaders: and they almost all want us to be a part of the community they're building, and if we choose to participate we can help mold it into a fantastic organization. We won't be freeze out of things because we don't align with one specific nation state.

This is an insurmountable opportunity for the United States, and having gauged the opinions of a wide range of people we have decided that we will move forward and submit our application to participate in this United Nations. This is just the beginning of a new chapter for our foreign affairs, and it opens up so many new doors. Organizations such as the World Trade Organization or NATO, which have seemed impossible when we have no friends, are now entirely back on the table.
